

Lawyers And Common Man

People and companies hire lawyers to give them advice and to tell them what they can and can't do under the law. Sometimes, they hire lawyers to take their side in court against other people or companies, or against the government. Lawyers spend a lot of time doing research. To be a good lawyer, a person must be good at finding facts in books, on computers, and in other places. Lawyers also interview people to get information. After doing research, lawyers make arguments to show that the people they work for should win in court. Some lawyers speak in court. But many lawyers don't. Lawyers also spend time writing. They write their arguments. Lawyers also write legal documents like contracts and wills. They need to be very specific. Lawyers do most of their work in offices, law libraries, and courtrooms. They sometimes meet in clients' homes or businesses. Some lawyers meet clients in hospitals or prisons. Lawyers often work long hours, especially during a trial in court. Lawyers need a license from the State in which they want to work. To get a license, people need to get a college degree and then go to law school for 3 years. Finally, lawyers must pass a test called the bar examination. Even after they start working, lawyers need to keep on learning about changes in the law. Most States make lawyers take classes from time to time. To start getting ready for this job, students can take English classes to learn how to write, do research, and make presentations. Social studies classes teach about research and the law. People who want to be lawyers also need strong reading skills. Lawyers are some of the highest paid workers. Many lawyers work for themselves. But other lawyers work for governments and private organizations. They earn a salary. Most lawyers worked for themselves or in law firms-companies with other lawyers. Some lawyers worked for other businesses or for governments. Employment of lawyers is expected to grow about as fast as the average for all occupations through 2014. This is because more people will need legal help. But many people want to be lawyers, so there will be competition for good jobs. We may need to communicate with your lawyer while the project is underway, our lawyer should promptly return your telephone calls, and your lawyer should send you copies of all pertinent documents that she or he prepares or receives in connection with your project. And if you need to meet with your lawyer, you should not be kept waiting too long. In addition, your lawyer should be able to explain things in language that you can understand. In all, your lawyer should always be courteous. And when the project is complete, your lawyer should give you copies of the final documents in a neat, well-organized package.
